Engagement Surveys Lead to Mediocre Outcomes

You can chart a better path for people, your customers, and your profits

Written by: Keith Ayers

Your top employees may not be as engaged as you think they are. Unless you ensure your best people are truly passionate about your organization, you risk failing to harness their potential.

Or, worse still, you risk losing them completely. A failure to foster passionate employees is bad for your customers and bad for your bottom line.

But you can take action today to identify your passion deficit, get the most from your best people and win more customers-for-life.

Limitations of “Employee Engagement”

Most leaders worry about whether their top people are committed to their job, if they will perform to their full potential and whether they will ultimately stick around. Conventional wisdom says leaders should focus on employee engagement to address this problem. Conventional wisdom is wrong.

In the modern economy, chances are your employees have chosen their career path and enjoy their profession. In simple terms they are likely to be engaged by their work.

Leaders need to look beyond engagement and instead assess how passionate people are about the organization itself.

That emotional connection to the organization makes the crucial difference for customer loyalty and the bottom line.

Why is Passion so Important?

A passionate employee is focused, engaged, and committed to consistently perform at their best. They feel strongly about the work they do, knowing that they are creating value.

They have a strong emotional connection to the organization they work for and feel a sense of pride and commitment towards it.

As a result, they deliver exceptional value to customers, both external and internal. An engaged employee may like the work they do, but if they don't have a strong emotional connection to their organization, they also may not care whether the organization succeeds or not. Therefore, they maybe ready and willing to apply their trade elsewhere.

Traditional engagement surveys can't tell the difference between these two types of employees.

Our research has discovered that a large majority of employees fit into the typical engaged category. But of these engaged employees, approximately half are passionate about the organization.

This gap “the passion deficit” underlines the hidden emotional disconnect among otherwise engaged employees. Our passion survey ranks employees at 5 levels, rather than 3 in traditional engagement surveys.

An engaged employee is at Level 4 while a passionate employee is at Level 5. Thankfully there are very few Level 1 employees out there.

The Leadership Challenge

The passion deficit presents a challenge for leaders.

Firstly, those who are not passionate about the organization will be more difficult to retain. But high potential and otherwise engaged employees are the ones you most want to keep.

Secondly, those who are not passionate about the organization are far less likely to deliver excellent customer service than those who are passionate.

After all, why would they promote an organization they are not passionate about?

Level 4 Employees

Passionate only about the job

Level 4 employees are passionate about their work and get great satisfaction from knowing they make a difference. However, they feel somewhat disengaged from the organization – they don't feel their contribution is valued.

Level 5 Employees

Passionate about the job and the organization

Employees at Level 5 are passionate about their work and the organization they work for. They feel valued and respected and know that what they do makes a real difference.

Creating a Customer Focused Culture

Janet, the CEO of a mid-sized Australian insurance company, recently discovered for herself the difference between engaged and passionate employees.

The company had run engagement surveys on a yearly basis, consistently yielding positive results. Yet employee turnover was higher than Janet would have liked and customer satisfaction levels were not improving. When she decided to take a look at passion levels, the hidden emotional disconnect was all too apparent.

Armed now with detailed data on employee passion levels and drivers of her passionate employees, Janet could see where the organization was falling short. She was able to hone in on the key factors that differentiated between her Level 4 and Level 5 people. Her own team members spelled it out for her in the survey. They wanted to:

- ✓ Get the recognition they believe they deserve
- ✓ Know that their work is meaningful because it helps their organization fulfill its mission
- ✓ Work for managers who trust them and treat them with respect
- ✓ Have the opportunity to increase their knowledge and develop new skills

It Starts at the Top

Janet realized that her behavior and that of her managers, ultimately determines whether these four needs will be satisfied. Working closely with her team, Janet was able to make targeted changes based on the survey findings, on how managers and the company as a whole behave. She saw a significant improvement in turnover and increased customer service levels within 18 months. This personal responsibility at the leadership level is critical to developing passionate people.

Building a team of passionate employees sets you apart from your competitors because your people will be a step above. Your customers will notice—so too will your CFO.

It's time to stop focusing on engagement and prioritize increasing employee passion.
